

DID NOT HEED ILLNESS, DR. JAS. E. BROWN DIES

Despite High Temperature Continued Practise and Grippe Proves Fatal

Dr. James Ewart Brown, 10 Carlton street, died on Saturday from an attack of the grippe. Dr. Brown took ill early in the week, but despite a high temperature, continued his practise. His son, Dr. W. E. Brown of Carlton street, is also ill, and was unable to see his father before he died. The son was overseas a year ago when the mother died.

Dr. Brown was born near Bowmanville in 1857, and graduated from Trinity Medical College in 1884. He took a post-graduate course in Edinburg, and served in hospitals in London, England, for two years. In Edinburg he won the degree of F. R. C. T. On returning to Canada he practised in Stratford and Arkona, coming to Toronto in 1904, though he did not practise here until two years ago. He was one of the members of the "gold rush" to the Klondyke in 1897. His only son survives him, as well as four sisters and two brothers, Rev. S. G. of Almonte, and T. A. of Ottawa.
